Whose Side Are You on?

Should social media have a “Dislike” button?

One possible benefit of a “Dislike” button is that it would let people disagree with or be unhappy with a post without having to say something bad about it.

This could help make conversations on social media platforms more open, honest, and respectful.

A “Dislike” button could also help figure out what users like or find useful. By letting people express what they don’t like about a post, content creators can get useful feedback and learn what their audience likes and doesn’t like.

The “Dislike” button can definitely be a useful tool to measure online engagement, but there are more negative effects than the positive. The presence of “Dislike” buttons and other negative replies illustrates how unfriendly social media can be. Many businesses directly ask for “5-star” ratings because anything less may actually hurt their reputation. A “Dislike” button encourages users to take advantage of the system rather than provide an honest opinion. While it may be useful for creators, it can also be harmful to both them and everyone else.

Is it okay to regift?

Many gifts are thoughtful and personalized for the receiver. However, with online shopping apps and convenience stores everywhere, many gifts are also given just so that the giver isn’t caught empty-handed. I don’t see a problem with regifting common gifts until they find a home with someone who will appreciate them. The giving of the gift is the thoughtful gesture, not the actual gift itself. For this reason, you shouldn’t feel guilty about regifting something that might be thrown away.

I don’t think regifting is a good thing. A gift is something you receive from someone who put thought and effort into it. A gift is more than just an item. It contains the giver’s feelings for the receiver. Something like that shouldn’t just be given away to another person. Also, if the original giver finds out that their gift was given away, it could cause hard feelings. All in all, I don’t think regifting is worth the trouble that it could cause. Just keep the gift as a reminder of a good relationship.
